ABSTRACT

This bibliography catalogs all the literature in the National Criminals Justice Reference Service database on the topic of alternatives to institutionalization. The materials represented pertain to such diverse alternatives as juvenile training schools, pre-release centers, halfway houses, work-release programs, weekend sentencing, restitution, group and foster homes, community service orders, probation and parole. Additionally, materials on bail and release on recognizance are included when they serve as a means of avoiding incarceration. The citations are presented in alphabetical order by title. Author and subject indexes are appended to assist users. (Author)

The National Criminal Justice Reference Service (NCJRS) is an international clearinghouse of information on law enforcement and criminal justice sponsored by the National Institute of Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice, the research center of the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration. The Institute was established by Congress in the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 and among its responsibilities of research, development, and evaluation is one to maintain a clearinghouse for the exchange of information about law enforcement and criminal justice. This clearinghouse—NCJRS—collects relevant documents from sources all over the world and maintains a computerized data base of approximately 40,000 documents about police, courts, prosecutors, public defenders, corrections, juvenile justice, and human resource development. By collecting and disseminating this information, NCJRS contributes to the goal of improving law enforcement and criminal justice.

NCJRS is operated and administered by Aspen Systems Corporation for the National Institute of Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice under contract number J-LEAA-023-77 with the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration, U.S. Department of Justice.

INTRODUCTION

The search for alternatives to institutionalization has been underway for more than a century. In that time probation and parole have flowered; halfway houses were born, died away, and reborn. By the late 1950's and early 1960's the search for alternatives to institutionalization in criminal justice, influenced by the deinstitutionalization trend in mental health and by a growing realization of the rehabilitative limitations of confinement, took on new importance. With support from the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration, there have been a variety of new projects that implement and, in some cases, evaluate alternatives to confinement to a total-care institution.

This bibliography documents the search for alternatives to institutionalization. As long as there have been laws to guide individual behavior in society there have been those who have been unwilling or unable to abide by those laws. Early punishments for such violations included torture, death, and slavery, which gave way, over time, to a more "humane" theory of confinement. Yet, for the most part, prisons only seemed to reinforce, and often refine criminality. As overcrowding and maintenance costs burdened the already aggravated conditions of incarceration, the search for alternatives to institutionalization began.

Until the 17th century the English common law bases for punishing those who had violated the law were deterrence and retribution. For offenses that might be considered trivial today, 17th century offenders were subjected to public ridicule by confinement to the stocks. Those guilty of misdemeanors and felonies might be punished with whipping, maiming, or hanging. In short, it was believed that offenders and those at-risk would be deterred from committing any crime if the punishments were sufficiently harsh. Yet an examination of English history for that time reveals that, in spite of hundreds of executions and uncounted numbers of other punishments, crime continued to flourish.

At the beginning of the Enlightenment of the 18th century, people of compassion began to see the inhumanity of these penal measures. They suggested a more productive strategy: encourage the offender to cooperate with and integrate into society, a difficult goal to achieve if the person were maimed. These early criminologists and political philosophers also felt that such punishments violated the fundamental rights of men. They proposed a more humane system of containment, or incapacitation, with some potential for restoring the offender to society.

Workhouses, the precursors of jails and penitentiaries, had been used since the Middle Ages to hold paupers, beggars, and those awaiting trial. Long-term incarceration was not an accepted sentence; prison labor was only used to reduce the costs of confinement. It remained for the Quakers in Pennsylvania under William Penn to introduce the concept of hard labor as part of the sentence. As is often the case today, these early jails provided a breeding ground for more and better criminals. The Auburn (1819) and Pennsylvania (1829) systems of confinement based on penitence, silence, and labor were established to correct this situation. By the mid 19th century reformers were agitating for a method to relieve prison overcrowding and to reward prisoners whose behavior reflected a positive change in attitude. The need for return to society under controlled conditions was recognized and special pre- or postrelease lodging arrangements outside the institution were suggested to facilitate inmates' adjustment to their new freedom. Probation, parole, and halfway houses were thus developed as alternatives to continued institutionalization.

Although essentially a 20th century development, the origins of probation go back to English common law and earlier, to the medieval "benefit of clergy." In the United States John Augustus, a Boston shoemaker, is considered the father of modern probation. In 1841, he asked the courts to release certain offenders into his custody. With the same methods in use today, namely investigation and screening, interviewing, supervision, employment, education, and financial relief, he demonstrated such a consistent record of success that the Massachusetts legislature formally established probation in 1878.

Parole developed from a number of sources including conditional pardon, indenture, English and Irish experiences with Tickets of Leave, and the work of penal reformers in America. The English Penal Servitude Act of 1853 gave legal status to the Ticket of Leave system and developed standards for conditional release. In its earliest applications, those released on the Ticket of Leave were unsupervised. This was quickly recognized as a mistake. In 1854 Sir William Crofton was named to head the Irish prison system. He implemented what came to be known as the Irish system or the Crofton system, which included provisions for conditional release upon good behavior and supervision after release. By 1865, American prison reformers had heard of this new idea and advocated its implementation. Twelve years later, in 1877, parole was implemented for the first time in the United States at the Elmira Reformatory in New York State.

Halfway houses were initially opened in New York, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania and were maintained primarily by religious and private organizations of volunteers. Originally conceived as temporary housing for ex-offenders, halfway houses have become a means of minimizing penetration into the justice system as well as preparing offenders for reentry to society.

The difficulties of reentering society can be avoided if offenders are not removed from the community, and during the latter half of the 20th century there has been a surge of interest in the concept of diversion. Diversion is based on several factors: growing recognition that the community can have a significant impact on behavior, uncertainty about the effectiveness of more traditional methods, and the public's inclination to more active involvement in governmental affairs.

Diversion was designed to encompass a range of alternatives, all intended to avoid, minimize, halt, or suspend penetration into the criminal justice system. Referral is usually made to some specific treatment program rather than to institutions or probation. Calculated to fall somewhere between the supervision of regular probation and incarceration, while giving a greater measure of guidance than traditionally associated with probation, diversionary alternatives are based on the belief that handling offenders outside of the formal criminal justice system avoids the potential stigma, or label, associated with criminal behavior. Although diversion may limit penetration, it does so by diffusing contact over a wider area, creating a risk of subtly, yet continually, involving the offender with the criminal justice system. Thus, diversion may promote what it was designed to avoid. Another consideration regarding diversion programs is the expected cost savings over institutionalization. This has been the subject of considerable controversy and has not been conclusively resolved.

This bibliography catalogs all of the literature in the NCJRS data base on the broad subject of alternatives to institutionalization. The more than 2,200 entries describe the various alternatives that have been proposed, implemented, and evaluated over the years. The materials represented pertain to such diverse alternatives as juvenile training schools, prerelease centers, halfway houses, work-release programs, restitution, weekend sentencing, community service orders, group and foster homes, and probation and parole. Bail and release on recognizance are included when they are used as a means for avoiding incarceration.

The citations are presented in alphabetical order by title; author and subject indexes are appended to assist researchers. The NCJ accession numbers, bibliographic information, availability sources, annotations, and indexes are printed directly from the computerized data base of the National Criminal Justice Reference Service.

Because this definitive bibliography marks a departure from all previous NCJRS bibliographic publications, a reader's survey is printed on the final page. Your cooperation in completing and returning this questionnaire is greatly appreciated.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT

This first Definitive Bibliography is the culmination of several months of effort by a number of NCJRS staff members. Shu Shun Chiang, Eileen Garry, and Tom Schrinel were instrumental in identifying new material to be added to the NCJRS data base in support of this project. Nadav Katz and Chris Lundy provided expertise in acquiring and accessioning new documents. Thomas Ketterman's assistance in searching the NCJRS data base was most helpful. The task of converting information from the NCJRS data base to typeset pages was accomplished through the efforts of Allen Foster.

HOW TO OBTAIN THESE DOCUMENTS

All documents in this bibliography are included in the collection of the National Criminal Justice Reference Service (NCJRS) and are available to the public in the NCJRS Reading Room on weekdays between 9 a.m. and 5 p.m. (NCJRS Reading Room, Suite 211, 1015 20th Street, NW., Washington, D.C.). Many of the documents may also be found in public and organizational libraries.

For researchers who prefer to obtain personal copies, an availability source is identified whenever possible. This information reflects availability at time of publication and NCJRS cannot guarantee that documents remain available from publishers and distributors.

Microfiche From NCJRS

The designation "NCJRS Microfiche Program" indicates that a free microfiche copy of the document is available from NCJRS. Microfiche is a 4 x 6 inch sheet of film that contains the reduced images of up to 98 pages of text. Because the image is reduced 24 times, a microfiche reader (available at most public and academic libraries) is essential to read microfiche documents. Requests for microfiche should include the title and NCJ number and be addressed to:
